“We’re happy here but the extractor fan has been broken since summer and I’ve reported it twice.”

That is not a positive reply.

The first four words do all the work. Sentiment scoring reads it as positive.

So does a person scanning forty of them.

“Since summer.” This stopped being a repair a while ago.

It is now a feature of the apartment.

“Reported it twice.” They used your process.

Your process did ~~nothing~~, and they noticed.

A resident who shouts is engaged.
A resident who is polite about something they gave up on has already started leaving.

Grievance. Maintenance. High urgency. High confidence.

Next action: check the work order history, call today.
Synthetic resident, real output.

The same resident, on a survey, months from their lease end: a fine score.

Nothing to act on, and ~~no reason to act now~~.

Search your resident replies for “still” and “again.”

Read every one of those twice.

SAMBHAV JAIN